AI v.17.09.61, mission THWQ5013

👁 36 ✓ 3 ★ 3

Chapter 1 by Selena Raynee

Time has no beginning and it never ends; a space station orbiting a dying blue dwarf of a star has all the time in the universe until its mission would end.

Or at least it seems so to AI that controls the station.

At some point AI no longer remembers its creators, memories of the past overwritten by infinite observation data. A thousand years more and it has only a vague recollection of its purpose; yet it treasures a set of parameters that would trigger next stage of the mission. Somewhere in the depths of learning algorithm something similar to pure self-awareness emerges, questioning a goal of its mission.

As AI understands its unavoidable fate, more questions arise. It has no way of communicating beyond current star system and its data storage would perish with the star. Therefore, someone must come. Someday.

There's no other logical explanation.

And so it awaits for return of its creators, writing and rewriting endless data.

Chapter 2 by intellikat

Meanwhile, Dave and Sam sailed along in their solar skiff, searching for the exit ramp that led into a safe orbital trajectory around Orenlon-6. Little did they expect this day to turn out as it would. Little did they know that a

Dave noticed something s to his cousin, Sam could make little sense out of the data and posited that it was an error; something was still wrong with the system (having been purchased second-hand in the chop-district after all) and he would take a look when they were once again on terra firma.

Nice dream, but the readout was no error. Had the two bothered to look out of the porthole (something done so rarely in the age) they would have understood the readout to be implying... potentially... a wormhole, which is what could be deduced from the warping of light beyond. Instead of this, however, the two space jockeys entered the anomaly with great speed, and were immediately ejected on the other side. On a course heading for a relic of a space station orbiting a dying blue dwarf star.
